

Camus, imaginative French writer, perhaps a little too [xxx], dreads totalitarianism as though it were apocalyptic, a scourge about to threaten the Western world; when, as a matter of fact, it has already fallen upon us. Whether East or West, capitalism or socialism, totalitarianism is glaringly manifest and strongly entrenched in every civilized country and governs the economies, social and political systems of the entire world. Its origins come from the machines of mass production.

Camus, the imaginative French writer—perhaps a little too [xxx] dreads totalitarianism as though it were apocalyptic, a scourge to come, when as a matter of fact it is here upon us in every civilized country, whether East or West, socialist or capitalist. The difference is that totalitarianism in a capitalist country is under private corporation rule, interested only in profit, mass production, vested corporation trusts, the centralization of capital and labor is correlating with socialism, the difference being that one appropriates for a private sector in every firm.

Everybody is human, especially when you reach that human side of him.

Each admits the state and what one calls the system is a Frankenstein overpowering him.

All people want to be nice, all are human but the system won't let them be nice. Take that German, for instance. We all hate his system, but we think he is nice and the man that's supposed to be a hero who is out to kill that German system we hate because he has an unfortunate personality.
