

[Speech for Roosevelt's inauguration?]

One of the strongest urges in man is his desire to cooperate with his fellow men. The glorious exaltation of moving together in one direction, especially if convinced that truth lies in that direction, makes the individual forget any selfish notions. If he believes that in a certain direction lies the common good of the all. In that way, the unanimity of President Roosevelt's re-election should be an inspiration to everyone. For the first time in the history of the world, the people of a nation have acted in the interest of themselves. The medium of radio has minimized the power of money and has swept us all.

Equality would make a dull, non-progressive world.

Equality in man would make a dull, non-progressive world, with dirt tunnels and mole hills. With man like ants living in dirt tunnels and mole hills throughout man's destiny and with about the same amount of progress.

Rich men, living like ants, digging dirt tunnels and making mole hills for the rest of his days, his progress wasn't developed any more than that of the ants who's his nemesis, the same as far back as man's knowledge goes.
